

Have you ever heard of Reality Based Budgeting? Have your state legislators? It's pretty simple. Take a look.

Priority and reality-based budgeting views all of state government -- all of its agencies and functions -- as a single enterprise. New proposals are evaluated in the context of all that state government is responsible for doing, and the strategies for achieving the best results are developed with an eye on all of the state's resources. Nothing is sacrosanct. It prompts governors and legislators to ask four key questions at the start of each legislative session:

1. What must the state accomplish?
2. How will the state measure its progress and success?
3. How much money does the state have available to spend?
4. What is the most efficient and effective way to deliver essential services within available funds?

Find out more at www.statebudgetsolutions.org.

Have you ever heard of Reality Based Budgeting? Have your state legislators? It's pretty simple. Take a look.

Priority and reality-based budgeting views all of state government -- all of its agencies and functions -- as a single enterprise. New proposals are evaluated in the context of all that state government is responsible for doing, and the strategies for achieving the best results are developed with an eye on all of the state's resources. Nothing is sacrosanct. It prompts governors and legislators to ask four key questions at the start of each legislative session:

1. What must the state accomplish?
2. How will the state measure its progress and success?
3. How much money does the state have available to spend?
4. What is the most efficient and effective way to deliver essential services within available funds?

Find out more at www.statebudgetsolutions.org.